

My life began on February 11, 2005, in the beautiful country of Colombia, born to an English father and Colombian mother. Growing up in a bilingual home, I was shaped by a mix of Spanish, English, and even Spanglish—often blending words when one slipped our minds. This diverse upbringing, shared with my little sister, built a strong foundation of connection and adaptability.

As a child, I was deeply into shows like Thomas the Tank Engine and Ben 10, and one of my earliest challenges was trying to communicate with my sister before she could speak. I remember worrying we'd never talk, but she eventually became one of the most important people in my life.

Being raised by teacher parents meant attending the schools they worked at. While this once felt embarrassing, I now see it as a gift—having their support close by helped me grow independently while always feeling backed up.

Middle school flew by effortlessly, but high school demanded more. Math and physics challenged me, but instead of backing away, I leaned in. The struggle taught me discipline and even led me to take on more advanced math courses.

Outside academics, I explored various sports like basketball, volleyball, badminton, and football. My passion for trying new activities reflects my belief in constantly learning and growing.

Travel has also been a major part of my life. Visiting different countries and cultures opened my eyes to the beauty of diversity and strengthened my understanding of people around the world.

Now, with adulthood on the horizon, I find myself balancing dreams with reality—seeking both purpose and stability. Choosing a future career has been one of the most serious decisions I've faced, but I move forward with curiosity, drive, and optimism.

My story is still unfolding. With each step, I carry the lessons of my past and the hope of what's to come—shaping a life that's uniquely mine.
